The Concept of Restorative Justice

IF INJUSTICE HURTS, JUSTICE SHOULD HEAL!

The conventional methods of achieving justice are flawed in many aspects. These methods are based on the assumption that incarceration is a direct way of providing justice to the victim and that imprisonment is going to prevent and deter further crime. This model is limiting because while a solution to the problem has been found, it may not be the desired solution and the root cause of the problem still remains unaddressed. Restorative Justice aims to create a level playing field where in all key stakeholders impacted by the crime come together to define their version of justice.

Restorative Justice is able to overcome certain flaws within the conventional justice systems. Firstly, it is able to establish a platform for dialogue between the victim, perpetrator and the whole community at large. This allows for the victim to be an active and direct participant in the process. The conventional systems leave the victims without justice. More often than not victims seek answers and yearn for an apology which is lost out in an adversarial system where in the offender is always defensive and the victim is left with many unanswered questions. Secondly, it leaves scope for an equal dialogue that reduces the propensity of domination of a single narrative. Offenders and victims are pitted against each other, whereas many a times they hail from similar backgrounds. Creating dialogue allows for the community to assess what went wrong and where, aiding them to discover the root cause of the issues. Also, in the adversarial system there is a domination of one narrative over the other ultimately leading to its 'victory'. The true victory in restorative justice is reaching a fairer and just society that has healed from the wrongdoings of one of its members. Lastly, it directly attacks the idea of incarceration. Incarceration is a veil that prevents the offender from facing the reality. It also makes the offender less accountable for his/her actions as they have never confronted and evaluated their misconduct. Restorative practices allow for the offender to feel shame, guilt and remorse. It also provides for an opportunity of apologizing and repairing tears in the community.

One of the largest restorative projects was undertaken by the truth and reconciliation commission in South Africa. The result of which was a society that could live in peace and harmony, which was previously torn by the atrocities one community inflicted on others. In an era fraught with turmoil, restorative justice is increasingly being accepted as the saving grace. Restorative justice is garnering popular momentum and being accepted worldwide. For instance, during the Tenth UN congress on Prevention of Crime and Treatment of Offenders, the Vienna Declaration on Crime and Justice advocated the development of restorative justice policies, procedures and programmes that are respectful of the rights, needs and interests of victims, offenders, communities and all of the parties.

Thus, it is evident that restorative justice is a therapeutic form of justice that is more emotionally intelligent and inclusive than conventional forms of justice. It humanizes criminal justice procedures and provides an alternative tool to address the matter. It ultimately leads to repairing a broken society.
